About the Conference

Digital literature also known as electronic literature is a new genre of literature that covers the writings created exclusively with the help of digital devices including computers, tablets and mobile phones and that can be read on these devices only. A work of electronic literature can be defined as "A construction whose literally aesthetics emerge from computations". It is a work that could only exist in the space for which it was developed called the digital space. N. Catherin Hayle's defines electronic literature as 'Digital born and meant to be read on computer'. Although many definitions of digital literature have emerged time to time, no definition is considered a perfect one.

One more aspect that digital literature has been added with emergence of robotic literature or literature created by A.I. So far many articles or poems have been written by robots or with the help of AI. The question arises if Artificial Intelligence or Robotic machines can create literature, whether this digital development is going to affect the creative faculty of human beings or it is going to enhance the level of human creativity. This conference is a humble attempt to deliberate on such issues related to digital literature.
